Discussion Program

Critical Issues in Public Art and Public Architecture

STOREFRONT for Art and Architecture presents a series of open forums to bring together artists, architects, arts administrators, and writers for round-table discussions of critical issues in public art and architecture. The discussions are intended to further define the aesthetic functions of art and architecture in the public realm, and to advance the critical role of artists and architects in society. The emphasis of these forums will be on discussions of basic principles that can bring collaboration of aesthetic ideals and public life.

Each discussion will be based on a topical issue presented by a moderator. Prior to the discussion, the moderator will prepare and distribute a press release, a briefing on the issues to the participants. Guest speakers can be invited to contribute their expertise on related matters, but panels will be eliminated to invite direct involvement from all participants in the discussion. All discussions will be tape-recorded for use by other organizations, and as material for future publications.

All discussions begin at 7 PM, and $2 contribution is requested.

- Topic Waterfront and Urban Access to the Earth

- Topic: Monuments Today

Content and subject matter of the arts in an age of cultural relativism. Moderator: Richard Haas

Premises of Discussion
Monuments Today

The public art work, the commissioned art work, the art work that was placed in situ in the street or in a public edifice traditionally acted to commemorate, to pay homage to certain beliefs, shared myths or heroes. The notion of something existing out there for another purpose than to be decorous or functionally decorative at the same time, is rather recent, though it was always a major part of any artist's agenda.

Aesthetics were then the subliminal issue not the core of thinking and certainly not the core thought of the sponsor. All this has changed today in our country where we have a system existing which no longer espouses beliefs. All this has steadily eroded over the course of the last century. For an artist to honor war, war heroes, political leaders is simply not part of our reality. Our suspicion of and even disdain for such individuals or concepts precludes any serious artist or architect taking on a commission on this basis unless it can be properly laced with irony or put in perspective.

The core of our thinking and education teaches us that all cultural values and beliefs are relative and that very little can be written in stone, or even in bronze or set in fresco but rather that the ephemeral is the rule of the moment. The concern for durability and lasting power is delegated more to engineers than to artists. If lives are on line, then design and maintenance are premium considerations. The shaping of aesthetics, style and the design of objects will not gain a universal audience or a vast constituency and even among the anointed it will only gain transitory support.

Those past monuments peppering our plazas and parks here in New York as elsewhere, monuments such as Grand Army Plaza in Brooklyn, Washington Square Arch or even the murals and sculpture on and in Rockefeller Center could not gain a support system today amongst the taste makers, critics or approving bodies of connoisseurs.

As much as all these groups may love the existence of these past memorials, they would vote "No" to such frivolity in spending funds for them today.

So what is the agenda generally given or asked for by a patron or public patronage currently? What are the expectations of what might constitute a public? Along the same lines, what is the artist likely to propose or who might the approve artist or type of artist be today? What are the new parameters?

Exhibition

Temporary Public Art: Changes and Interventions
January 15-February 13

Participating Artists: Kate Ericson/Mel Ziegler, Jenny Holzer, Alfredo Jaar, Krzysztof Wodiczko
Curator: Patricia Phillips

STOREFRONT for Art and Architecture presents an exhibition called "Temporary Public Art" from January 15 to February 13. The exhibition will explore the work of five artists who embrace issues of ephemerality and temporary conditions as inspiration, content, and structure in the production of public art. It is this intersection of public art and temporariness that creates a fruitful site for inquiry. The exhibition will include a documentation of and elements from temporary projects by Jenny Holzer, Alfredo Jaar, Krzysztof Wodiczko, and Kate Ericson and Mel Ziegler.

In the past 15 years, private and public agencies have been established to support the installation of permanent public art. This professionalization of public art has brought a stability to the production process for both artists and communities. But a landscape of only enduring projects is a mixed blessing; the danger is not controversy but banality.

For the artists in this exhibition and the projects represented, permanency is not a desired objective and the short-lived situation is welcomed for the unique opportunities it generates. Because of their ephemeral qualities these projects free the artist to explore marginal circumstances and sites, to examine topical ideas and urgent issues, and to investigate the notion of time itself in public art and public life. Suspended between object and event, temporary public art provides an ongoing laboratory for cultural research.

Temporary projects are a rich but unanalyzed area of creative invention. The temporary in public art provides an expanded and alternative forum for artists and the public to explore the idea and the consequences of public art in the late 20th century.

How You Can Help

STOREFRONT is the only not-for-profit alternative space for art and architecture in New York, and perhaps in the country. Since 1982, our exhibitions, projects, forums and publications have introduced a new generation of experimental works in art and architecture. More than just a gallery, STOREFRONT provides an open forum for much needed communication amongst the community of artists and architects in New York. It is our goal to support new experiments in art and architecture toward future advancement of the human environment.

STOREFRONT's objective is to build an open and free state for art and architecture. Although STOREFRONT is partly funded by the governmental agencies and foundations, we need your individual support even more. Please HELP! to keep this public organization going strong with your generous contribution.
